Employers sometimes incorrectly call their employees independent contractors instead of employees. This is called misclassification. Employers may misclassify workers as independent contractors because then they do not have to pay payroll taxes, contribute to Social Security, or pay workers’ compensation and unemployment insurance.

What is an independent contractor?
An independent contractor is a worker who provides goods or services to another individual or business through an agreement. The terms of the agreement (which does not have to be written) control the relationship, and the independent contractor treats the other party like a customer or client, rather than an employer. Independent contractors are self-employed, can have multiple clients, and typically find those clients on their own.

How do I know if I am an independent contractor or employee?
There is no clear rule identifying who is an employee and who is an independent contractor because it is based on the specific situation. Some things to look at are who controls the relationship, who controls the work, and whether the worker is economically dependent on the other person or business. If your employer gives you a 1099 tax form, instead of a W-2, they are treating you as an independent contractor. They may also be treating you as an independent contractor if they pay you in cash and don’t take out any taxes.

Why does misclassification matter?
Benefits and procedures are different for independent contractors and employees.

Independent contractors have fewer protections. Independent contractors are not protected by wage and hour laws.

You may be an employee, not an independent contractor if:
- Your employer has the power to exercise control over the way you complete your job (how, when, and where you do your work).
- Your hours are set by your employer.
- You are paid on set dates in regular amounts.
- You are given extensive supervision.
- You are trained by your employer to do your job in a certain way.
- Your employer provides the tools and materials required to perform your job.
- You have worked for the same employer year after year.
- You work for only one employer.

laws (e.g., minimum wage and overtime pay). They do not have access to workers’ compensation if injured on the job, and they usually cannot apply for unemployment insurance if out of work. In addition, independent contractors cannot get time off to take care of a serious health condition, and they are not protected from discrimination based on disability, age, national origin, race, or sex. Independent contractors aren’t guaranteed the right to collectively bargain.

Independent contractors pay more out of pocket taxes because they have to pay the full amount of payroll taxes, instead of splitting it with the employer.

What should you do if you think you were misclassified?
If you think you have been misclassified, make sure you keep detailed records of the hours and type of work you performed (including tasks and how you were supervised).

You may be entitled to wage recovery, unemployment insurance, or other legal remedies. Consult with an attorney.

You can also file IRS Form SS-8 to have your federal tax withholdings corrected. Your employer will know you have contacted the IRS.
